NEW QUESTION: 1A. Option DB. Option CC. Option AD. Option B
Answer: A,D
Explanation:B: ShowPrintUIAsync is an asynchronous method and it is responsible for making your Windows Store app display the appropriate print window. Here is a JavaScript code snippet to show how it is used to display a print window: // Function to process the print button click function printButtonClick() { Windows.Graphics.Printing.PrintManager.showPrintUIAsync(); }D: Example: 1. To each screen in your app from which you want to print, add the following code so that it runs when the screen is opened. In the PrintSampleJS sample app, this is done in the ready member of the members parameter to the WinJS.UI.Pages.define function that is called to create the screen. JavaScript var printManager = Windows.Graphics.Printing.PrintManager.getForCurrentView(); printManager.onprinttaskrequested = onPrintTaskRequested; Add the print-task event handler for that screen. Each screen in your app might need a different function if, for example, the content of each needs to be formatted differently for printing. This PrintSampleJS app includes a completion handler, which is shown here. It's a good idea to handle completion events because then your app can let the user know if an error occurred and provide possible solutions. Likewise, your app could use the completion event to indicate subsequent steps for the user to take after the print job is successful. JavaScript function onPrintTaskRequested(printEvent) { var printTask = printEvent.request.createPrintTask("Print Sample", function (args) { args.setSource(MSApp.getHtmlPrintDocumentSource(document)); }); // Register the handler for print task completion event printTask.oncompleted = onPrintTaskCompleted; };
