NEW QUESTION: 2An IT enterprise has three domain service inventories that map to three different departments. Each service inventory uses a security token service (STS) based authentication broker to enable single sign-on for services within the respective service inventory boundary. The tokens used for all single sign-on mechanisms are based on SAML assertions. You are given a new requirement to extend this security architecture so that services from different domain service inventories can communicate. What new security mechanisms are required to fulfill this requirement?A. There is no need to introduce a new security mechanism. The existing SAML tokens can be used by services across the domain service inventories as long as the existing authentication brokers are configured to issue service inventory-specific assertions for SAML tokens from specific domain service inventories.B. An additional authentication broker needs to be added in between each domain service inventory in order to enable communication between services using disparate security tokens.C. There is no need to introduce a new security mechanism. The individual domain service inventories need to be combined into a single enterprise service inventory. That way, the Service Perimeter Guard pattern can be applied so that services won't need to authenticate each other.D. The individual authentication brokers need to be replaced with one single authentication broker so that one single token can be used by services across all domain service inventories.Answer: A
