NEW QUESTION: 1What is the difference between Advisory and Regulatory security policies?A. there is no difference between themB. Advisory policies are mandated while Regulatory policies are notC. regulatory policies are high level policy, while advisory policies are very detailedD. Advisory policies are not mandated. Regulatory policies must be implemented.
Answer: D
Explanation:Advisory policies are security polices that are not mandated to be followed but are strongly suggested, perhaps with serious consequences defined for failure to follow them (such as termination, a job action warning, and so forth). A company with such policies wants most employees to consider these policies mandatory. Most policies fall under this broad category. Advisory policies can have many exclusions or application levels. Thus, these policies can control some employees more than others, according to their roles and responsibilities within that organization. For example, a policy that requires a certain procedure for transaction processing might allow for an alternative procedure under certain, specified conditions. Regulatory Regulatory policies are security policies that an organization must implement due to compliance, regulation, or other legal requirements. These companies might be financial institutions, public utilities, or some other type of organization that operates in the public interest. These policies are usually very detailed and are specific to the industry in which the organization operates. Regulatory polices commonly have two main purposes:1.To ensure that an organization is following the standard procedures or base practices of operation in its specific industry2.To give an organization the confidence that it is following the standard and accepted industry policy
Informative Informative policies are policies that exist simply to inform the reader. There are no implied or specified requirements, and the audience for this information could be certain internal (within the organization) or external parties. This does not mean that the policies are authorized for public consumption but that they are general enough to be distributed to external parties (vendors accessing an extranet, for example) without a loss of confidentiality.
