NEW QUESTION: 3 You have a Microsoft SQL Azure database named DBAzure1. DBAzure1 contains a table named Orders that stores sales data. Each order has a sales total that can only be discovered by querying multiple tables. You need to ensure that the value of the sales total is returned by executing a query on Orders. What should you create?A. A trigger that uses a ranking functionB. A calculated column that uses a scalar functionC. A calculated column that uses a table-valued functionD. A trigger that uses a table-valued functionAnswer: C
Explanation: A table-valued parameter is scoped to the stored procedure, function, or dynamic Transact-SQL text, exactly like other parameters. Similarly, a variable of table type has scope like any other local variable that is created by using a DECLARE statement. You can declare table-valued variables within dynamic Transact-SQL statements and pass these variables as table-valued parameters to stored procedures and functions. Table-valued parameters offer more flexibility and in some cases better performance than temporary tables or other ways to pass a list of parameters. Incorrect: Not A: A scalar function would only be able to use other columns from the same table.
