NEW QUESTION: 2What scenario could cause a 'false positive' intrusion alarm in a wireless intrusion prevention system (WIPS)?A. A rogue access point is located and found to have the same SSID as the authorized network.B. A client device has a high rate of frame retransmissions due to a noisy RF environment.C. A client device disassociates and reassociates to an AP several times in quick succession due to a lowRSSI value.D. A reporting delay from a remote RF sensor due to busy WAN links.Answer: C*Explanation:Companies implementing WLANs typically expect to have close to 100% wireless coverage of their facility. End users, however, will invariably find areas that were not analyzed during the site survey and have little or no coverage. An end user operating in this area might be able to connect wirelessly but will have continuous associations and disassociations. This causes the WIPS to incorrectly determine there is a denial of service (DoS) event in progress and issue a 'false positive' alarm, i.e. the system determines it has analyzed something of value when it is not (relatively speaking). Newer wireless solutions include 'coverage hole' detection that shows where authenticated clients are experiencing consistent association/disassociation events like those described and will make recommendations to increase AP power, antenna gain, or add more APs in the area affected.
