NEW QUESTION: 3An application developer wants to use the IBM Mobile Test Workbench to automate the creation, execution, and analysis of functional tests for a Worklight hybrid application on Android devices. The application developer has successfully installed and configured the IBM Mobile Test Workbench. After creating a test project, the application developer is now ready to generate a test from recording a session on the Android device. After selecting the application in the list of managed applications available in the Test Workbench Android client view, what must the application developer do to generate the test?A. 1. Click Install to install the application on the device Click Record in the mobile client on the device Interact with the device as needed Click Stop in the mobile client on the deviceB. 1. Click Record in the mobile client on the device Interact with the device as needed Tap the Back buttonC. 1. Click Record in the mobile client on the device Interact with the device as needed. Click Stop in the mobile client on the deviceD. 1. Click Install to install the application on the device Click Record in the mobile client on the device Interact with the device as needed Close the applicationAnswer: A*Explanation:The goal of mobile testing is to ensure that your mobile application meets the requirements that guided its design and development. To help you meet this goal, IBM Mobile Test Workbench for Worklight implements the following stages in the testing process: Configuration: Set up your test environment with IBM Mobile Test Workbench for Worklight and the SDKs for the mobile operating systems. Install the mobile test client on one or several mobile devices. Ensure that the mobile devices have connectivity through WiFi, 3G, or 4G, and add those devices to the test workbench. * Application preparation: Import the application that you want to test into the test workbench, or use the device to upload the application under test to the test workbench.- Test recording: Run the app from the mobile test client to start a recording. The recorder records all user interactions, sensor inputs, and application behavior, and uploads the recorded data to the test workbench, where it can be converted into a mobile test.- Test editing: After recording, you can edit the test in the natural language editor. You can use the mobile dataview to display and select UI elements from the recorded applications. You can replace recorded test values with variable test data, or add dynamic data to the test.- Testing: You can deploy and run automated tests on multiple devices to ensure that the app matches the expected behavior that is defined in verification points. During the run, each verification point is checked and receives a pass, fail, or inconclusive status and functional data is recorded.Evaluation of results:References:
