NEW QUESTION: 2Our service inventory contains the following three services that provide invoice-related dataaccess capabilities: Invoice, InvProc, and Proclnv. These services were created at differenttimes by different project teams and were not required to comply to any design standards. Therefore each of these services has a different data model for representing invoice data. Currently each of these three services has one service consumer: Service Consumer A accesses the Invoice service(1). Service Consumer B (2) accesses the InvProc service, and Service Consumer C (3) accesses the Proclnv service. Each service consumer invokes a data access capability of an invoice-related service, requiring that service to interact with the shared accounting database that is used by all invoice-related services (4,5, 6). Additionally, Service Consumer D was designed to access invoice data from the sharedaccounting database directly (7), (Within the context of this architecture. Service ConsumerD is labeled as a service consumer because it is accessing a resource that is related to theillustrated service architectures.) Assuming that the Invoice service, InvProc service, and Proclnv service are part of the same service inventory, what steps would be required to fully apply the Official Endpoint pattern?A. Because Service Consumers A, B, and C are already carrying out their data access via published contracts, they are not affected by the Official Endpoint pattern. Service Consumer D needs to be redesigned to not access the shared accounting databasedirectly, but to perform its data access by interacting with the official invoice-related service. The Service Abstraction principle can be further applied to hide the existence of the sharedaccounting database and other implementation details from current and future serviceconsumers.B. None of the above.

C. One of the invoice-related services needs to be chosen as the official service providing invoice data access capabilities. Service Consumers A, B, and C then need to be redesigned to only access the chosen invoice-related service. Because Service Consumer D does not rely on an invoice-related service, it is not affected by the Official Endpoint pattern and can continue to access the accounting database directly. The Service Abstraction principle can be further applied to hide the existence of the shared accounting database and other implementation details from current and future service consumers. D. One of the invoice-related services needs to be chosen as the official service providing invoice data access capabilities. Service Consumers A, B, and C then need to be redesigned to only access the chosen invoice-related service. Service Consumer D also needs to be redesigned to not access the shared accounting database directly, but to also perform its data access by interacting with the official invoice-related service. The Service Abstraction principle can be further applied to hide the existence of the shared accounting database and other implementation details from current and future service consumers. Answer: D
