NEW QUESTION: 2Your company has deployed Network Access Protection (NAP). You configure secure wireless access to the network by using 802.1X authentication from any access point.You need to ensure that all client computers that access the network are evaluated by NAP.What should you do?A. Configure all access points as RADIUS clients to the Network Policy Server (NPS).B. Create a network policy that defines Remote Access Server as a network connection method.C. Create a network policy that specifies EAP-TLS as the only available authentication method.D. Configure all access points as RADIUS clients to the Remediation Servers.Answer: A*Explanation:In order for all clients to be evaluated by NAP, the wireless access points they connect to must communicate with a RADIUS server that will direct them to NAP. This means the wireless access points must function as RADIUS clients that forward authentication requests to a Server 2008 RADIUS (NPS) server.Remediation servers provide updates for computers that fail the health check by the NAP, but do not necessarily function as RADIUS servers themselves.The Network connection method value in a Network Policy restricts NPS from evaluating a request unless it comes from the type of server specified. If we set this to RAS, then only Server 2008 routers would be able to be evaluated. All other clients on the network would fail to be checked.Reference:
<http://technet.microsoft.com/en-us/library/cc755309.aspx>Configuring EAP-TLS as the only available authentication method would essentially prevent client connections in the event another protocol is possibly used for 802.1X at the access points. At best, it enforces standardized security for the clients, but does not provide a method for them to be evaluated by NAP.
