NEW QUESTION: 1 Because of non-linear relationships in the data, the pipeline calculates the natural log (Ln) of the prices in the training data, trains a model to predict this natural log of price value, and then calculates the exponential of the scored label to get the predicted price. The training pipeline is shown in the exhibit (Click the Training pipeline tab.) You create a real-time inference pipeline from the training pipeline, as shown in the exhibit. (Click the Real-time pipeline lab.) You need to modify the inference pipeline to ensure that the web service returns the exponential of the scored label as the predicted automobile price and that client applications are not required to include a price value in the input values. Which three modifications must you make to the inference pipeline? Each correct answer presents part of the solution. A. Remove the Apply Math Operation module that replaces price with its natural log from the data flow. B. Connect the output of the Apply SQL Transformation to the Web Service Output module. C. Replace the training dataset module with a data input that does not include the price column. D. Replace the Web Service Input module with a data input that does not include the price column. Answer: B

by constructing it, or by calling `Indexes.GetClient` on the `SearchServiceClient`. Here we will use the first method.

2. Create the `indexBatch` with the documents something like:

var hotels = new Hotel[] { new Hotel() { HotelId = "3", BaseRate = 129.99, Description = "Close to town hall and the river" } }; ... var batch = IndexBatch.Upload(hotels);
```
3. The next step is to populate the newly-created `indexExample`:

var batch = IndexBatch.Upload(hotels); try { indexClient.Documents.Index(batch); }
