NEW QUESTION: 2 An important control that should be in place for external connections to a network that uses call-back schemes is:A. Breaking of a dial-up connection at the remote user's side of the lineB. Call enhancementC. Breaking of a dial-up connection at the organization's computing resource side of the lineD. Call forwardingAnswer: C Explanation: One attack that can be applied when call back is used for remote, dial-up connections is that the caller may not hang up. If the caller had been previously authenticated and has completed his/her session, a live connection into the remote network will still be maintained. Also, an unauthenticated remote user may hold the line open, acting as if call-back authentication has taken place. Thus, an active disconnect should be effected at the computing resource's side of the line. Answer "Breaking of a dial-up connection at the remote user's side of the line" is not correct since it involves the caller hanging up. Answer "call forwarding" is a feature that should be disabled, if possible, when used with call-back schemes. With call back, a cracker can have a call forwarded from a valid phone number to an invalid phone number during the call-back process. Answer "Call enhancement" is a distracter.
