NEW QUESTION: 1How do HP MSM products, which support the optimized WLAN architecture, forward client traffic onto the wired network?A. The APs can forward traffic for the some VSCs directly onto the wired network, but forward traffic tunneled or access-controlled VSCs to the controller.B. While an individual AP must either forward all traffic locally or forward all traffic to the controller, different APs can exhibit different behaviors based on the needs of the company.C. The APs always forward traffic directly onto the wired network, thereby optimizing the traffic flow.D. The controller always forwards traffic onto the wired network, thereby simplifying management and improving security.Answer: A*Explanation:Student Guide Book 1 - Implementing and Troubleshooting HP Wireless Networks - Page 1-44 Optimized WLAN architectures HP uses the optimized WLAN architecture-an architecture that capitalizes on the strengths of the centralized WLAN architecture while overcoming its limitations.With the optimized WLAN architecture, you still have all the benefits of configuring and managing APs, which might be deployed at several sites, from a centralized controller. However, you also have much more flexibility in how traffic is distributed onto the wired network and how authentication and access control measures are applied.You can configure an optimized WLAN architecture to: Use APs to enforce user authentication to an external server and to bridge users' wireless traffic directly onto the wired network Use the controller to enforce user authentication (to a local database or an external server), but allow APs to forward authenticated users' wireless traffic directly onto the wired network Use the controller to handle both users' authentication and the forwarding of all wireless user traffic onto the corporate LAN These options are shown in the figure: Distributed forwarding Distributed forwarding with centralized authentication Centralized access control As you will see when you begin implementing VSCs in the labs for this course, you can configure how traffic is handled for each VSC. That is, one VSC might be configured with centralized access control, which means the AP forwards all authentication and wireless users' traffic to the controller. For another VSC, the AP may handle authentication requests and forward traffic directly onto the wired network. For all architectures, management traffic flows between the controlled AP and the controller. How the APs and controller handle user traffic, as well as traffic related to authenticating users, relates to the type of VSC.
