NEW QUESTION: 3Your company has recently implemented Oracle Fusion sales. In order to help prevent data loss or corruption, the company has decided to export and store data separately from the system. You have been asked to configure and run the export process. Identify the two steps that will be part of your process.A. Combine multiple view objects into a single export process.B. After the export process is complete, set the files to FTP automatically to a separate server.C. After the Initial export, apply a new date filter on the existing export map to create an incremental export.D. Label the Export Process ID in a natural language way so that other employees can easily determine the export job's intended function.E. After the export process is complete, access the files from the Oracle Web Server.Answer: C,D

Explanation:In the two step process used by Oracle Fusion Bulk Export, the first is the mapping of files for the full and incremental extract processes. The second step is the scheduling of the export. You create a process definition that includes both of these steps.The process definition has three components that together make exporting data easier by leveraging the export maps that you have already built. The process name, the export process ID and the export map ID all serve to identify the specific process definition as well as leverage your work with reusable export mapsReference: Oracle Fusion Applications Sales Implementation Guide, Bulk Export Process Components: How They Work Together
