NEW QUESTION: 1 Which of the following is true about input validation in a client-server architecture, when data integrity is critical to the organization? A. It must be protected by SSL encryption. B. It must rely on the user's knowledge of the application. C. It should be enforced on the client side only. D. It should be performed on the server side. Answer: D
Explanation: Section: Application, Data and Host Security
Explanation/Reference: Explanation: Client-side validation should only be used to improve user experience, never for security purposes. A client-side input validation check can improve application performance by catching malformed input on the client and, therefore, saving a roundtrip to the server. However, client side validation can be easily bypassed and should never be used for security purposes. Always use server-side validation to protect your application from malicious attacks.
