NEW QUESTION: 2Your company wants to deploy several microservices to help their system handle elastic loads. Each microservice uses a different version of software libraries. You want to enable their developers to keep their development environment in sync with the various production services. Which technology should you choose?
A. Containers
B. Chef/Puppet
C. Virtual machines
D. RPM/DEB
Answer: A
Explanation:A is not correct because although OS packages are a convenient way to distribute and deploy libraries, they don't directly help with synchronizing. Even with a common repository, the development environments will probably deviate from production. B is correct because using containers for development, test, and production deployments abstracts away system OS environments, so that a single host OS image can be used for all environments. Changes that are made during development are captured using a copy-on-write filesystem, and teams can easily publish new versions of the microservices in a repository. C is not correct because although infrastructure configuration as code can help unify production and test environments, it is very difficult to make all changes during development this way. D is not correct because virtual machines run their own OS, which will eventually deviate in each environment, just as now.
