NEW QUESTION: 2 A 20 percent decline in lobster catches in Maine waters since 1980 can be justifiably blamed on legislation passed in 1972 to protect harbor seals. Maine's population of harbor seals is now double the level existing before protection was initiated, and these seals are known to eat both fish and lobsters. Which of the following, if true, would most seriously weaken the argument above?A. The record lobster harvests of the late 1970's removed large numbers of mature lobsters from the reproductive stock.B. Authors of the 1972 legislation protecting harbor seals were convinced that an increase in that animal's numbers would not have a measurably negative impact on the lobster catch.C. Harbor seals usually eat more fish than lobsters, but the seals are natural predators of both.D. Harbor seals attract tourists to Maine's coastal areas, thus revitalizing the local economy.E. Although harbor seals are skillful predators of lobsters, they rarely finish eating their catch.Answer: A Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation:

NEW QUESTION: 3 Joe a company's new security specialist is assigned a role to conduct monthly vulnerability scans across the network. He notices that the scanner is returning a large amount of false positives or failed audits. Which of the following should Joe recommend to remediate these issues?A. Ensure the vulnerability scanner is attempting to exploit the weaknesses it discoversB. Ensure the vulnerability scanner is conducting antivirus scanningC. Ensure the vulnerability scanner is configured to authenticate with a privileged accountD. Ensure the vulnerability scanner is located in a segmented VLAN that has access to the company's serversAnswer: D Explanation: The vulnerability scanner is returning false positives because it is trying to scan servers that it doesn't have access to; for example, servers on the Internet. We need to ensure that the local network servers only are scanned. We can do this by locating the vulnerability scanner in a segmented VLAN that has access to the company's servers. A false positive is an error in some evaluation process in which a condition tested for is mistakenly found to have been detected. In spam filters, for example, a false positive is a legitimate message mistakenly marked as UBE --unsolicited bulk email, as junk email is more formally known. Messages that are determined to be spam -- whether correctly or incorrectly -- may be rejected by a server or client-side spam filter and returned to the sender as bounce e-mail. One problem with many spam filtering tools is that if they are configured stringently enough to be effective, there is a fairly high chance of getting false positives. The risk of accidentally blocking an important message has been enough to deter many companies from implementing any anti-spam measures at all. False positives are also common in security systems. A host intrusion prevention system (HIPS), for example, looks for anomalies, such as deviations in bandwidth, protocols and ports. When activity varies outside of an acceptable range - for example, a remote application attempting to open a normally closed port -- an intrusion may be in progress. However, an anomaly, such as a sudden spike in bandwidth use, does not guarantee an actual attack, so this approach amounts to an educated guess and the chance for false positives can be high. False positives contrast with false negatives, which are results indicating mistakenly that some condition tested for is absent.
