NEW QUESTION: 4According to Michael E. Porter's analysis of the evolution of global industries, the factor that is always necessary for an industry to become global is:A. The existence of environmental triggers to begin globalization.B. Marketing economies of scale.C. A strategic innovation.D. Changes in the costs of the factors of production.Answer: C
Explanation:The triggers of the evolution of global industries establish or exploit the sources of global competitive advantage. They also may negate the impediments to global competition. However, negating impediments will not result in globalization unless the firm has sufficient strategic advantages. Moreover, a strategic innovation is always necessary for an industry to become global. Environmental triggers include an increase in any of the types of economies of scale, lower transportation or storage costs, changes in distribution channels that facilitate access by foreign firms, changes in the costs of the factors of production, increased similarity of economic and social conditions in other nations, and reduction in governmental constraints. However, strategic innovations may begin globalization even if environmental triggers are not present. These innovations include, for example, product redefinition, reducing the costs of adapting a product for sale in different nations, design changes, and elimination of constraints.
