NEW QUESTION: 3A company has an application that uses Azure SQL Database as the data store. The application experiences a large increase in activity during the last month of each year. You need to manually scale the Azure SQL Database instance to account for the increase in data write operations. Which scaling method should you recommend?A. Scale out by sharding the data across databases.B. Scale up by increasing the database throughput units.C. Scale up by using elastic pools to distribute resources.Answer: B Explanation: As of now, the cost of running an Azure SQL database instance is based on the number of Database Throughput Units (DTUs) allocated for the database. When determining the number of units to allocate for the solution, a major contributing factor is to identify what processing power is needed to handle the volume of expected requests. Running the statement to upgrade/downgrade your database takes a matter of seconds. Incorrect Answers: A: Elastic pools is used if there are two or more databases. References:
