NEW QUESTION: 2What are the implications for a client with renal insufficiency who wants to start a low-carbohydrate (CHO) diet?A. As long as the client eats foods that are high biologic protein sources, a low CHO diet can be followed.B. As long as the client eats a minimum of 30g of CHO/day, there should be no problem.C. The client's clinical condition is a contraindication to starting a low CHO diet.D. Calcium supplements should be utilized to prevent the development of osteoporosis while on a low CHO diet.Answer: C*Explanation: Explanation/Reference:Explanation:A client with renal insufficiency should not start a low CHO diet because it could result in an increased renal solute load. Clients who have renal disease (renal failure, endstage renal disease [ESRD], dialysis, and transplant) or liver disease (liver failure, hepatic encephalopathy, cirrhosis, transplant, and hepatitis) require some form of protein control in dietary patterns to prevent complications from an inability to handle protein solute load. Proteins used in the diet must be of high biologic value, and protein intake is usually weight based, starting at 0.8 g/kg of dry weight, depending on the client's underlying clinical condition. Protein levels may be increased as necessary to account for metabolic response to dialysis and regeneration of liver tissue (1.5-2.0 g/kg/day). A minimum level of CHOs are needed in the diet (50-100 g/ day) to spare protein. Vitamin and mineral supplements might be indicated with clients who have liver failure. The dietician is instrumental in calculating specific nutrient requirements for these clients and reviewing fluid intake and output, medication profile, and daily weight to monitor client outcomes in conjunction with dialysis technicians and nurses. NEW QUESTION: 3During the Sprint Review, the Product Owner decides to release the current Increment to production. The stakeholders suggest temporarily delaying the next Sprint in order to respond more quickly to user feedback after the release. The Product Owner prefers to continue to the next Sprint and make progress towards the next release. Steven, the Scrum Master, begins facilitating the discussion. What would be two acceptable outcomes of the discussion? (Choose two.) A. Continue with the Sprints but shorten the Sprint time-boxes to allow for shorter feedback loops. B. Delay the next Sprint to allow the Development Team to work on new customer feedback. C. Continue with the Sprints and include the customer feedback in the Product Backlog. D. Continue with the Sprints but allow the Sprint Goal within the Sprint to change according to the customer feedback. Answer: A, C Explanation: A new Sprint starts immediately after the conclusion of the previous Sprint. Delaying the start of the next Sprint interrupts progress and can reduce the Time-to-Market. Shortening the Sprint length allows the team to respond quicker to changes outside of the Sprint plan and while still allowing delivery of business value. Adding user feedback to the Product Backlog helps the Product Owner with ordering the backlog to maximize the flow of value. During the Sprint no changes are made that would endanger the Sprint Goal.
