NEW QUESTION: 1You have a computer that runs Windows 7. You create an Encrypting File System (EFS) recovery key and certificate. You need to ensure that your user account can decrypt all EFS files on the computer. What should you do?
A. From the local computer policy, add a data recovery agent.
B. From Credential Manager, add a certificate-based credential.
C. From Credential Manager, add a Windows credential.
D. From the local computer policy, modify the Restore files and directories setting.
Answer: A
Explanation: Explanation/Reference:
Explanation: EFS Recovery Agents are certificates that allow the restoration of EFS encrypted files. When a recovery agent has been specified using local policies, all EFS encrypted files can be recovered using the recovery agent private key. You should specify a recovery agent before you allow users to encrypt files on a client running Windows 7. You can recover all files that users encrypt after the creation of a recovery agent using the recovery agent's private key. You are not able to decrypt files that were encrypted before a recovery agent certificate was specified. You create an EFS recovery agent by performing the following steps:
Log on to the client running Windows 7 using the first account created, which is the default administrator account. Open a command prompt and issue the command `Cipher.exe /r:recoveryagent`. This creates two files: `Recoveryagent.cer` and `Recoveryagent.pfx`. `Cipher.exe` prompts you to specify a password when creating `Recoveryagent.pfx`. Open the Local Group Policy Editor and navigate to the Computer Configuration > Windows Settings > Security Settings > Public Key Policies > Encrypting File System node. Right-click this node and then click Add Data Recovery Agent. Specify the location of `Recoveryagent.cer` to specify this certificate as the recovery agent. To recover files, use the certificates console to import `Recoveryagent.pfx`. This is the recovery agent's private key. Keep it safe because it can be used to open any encrypted file on the client running Windows 7.
