NEW QUESTION: 2An application developer wants to protect their application against specific malware and repackaging attacks by implementing application authenticity testing via the console. Per the requirements, the developer wishes to implement a check where the Worklight Server will test the authenticity of an application. If the application fails the authenticity check, the Worklight Server will output a message to the log containing relevant information, but the application will still run as expected.Which type of application authenticity should the application developer implement via the console with the above requirements?A. Enabled, notifyingB. Enabled, loggingC. Enabled, servicingD. Enabled, blockingAnswer: C*Explanation: Worklight Console allows enabling or disabling the application authenticity realm in run time. This feature is useful for the Development and QA environments. There are three modes you can set:- Enabled, blocking - means that the application authenticity check is enabled. If the application fails the check,it is not served by a Worklight server. - Enabled, serving - means that the application authenticity check is enabled. If the application fails the check,it is still served by a Worklight server.- Disabled - means that the application authenticity check is disabled.
