NEW QUESTION: 2The implementation of continuous monitoring controls is the BEST option where:A. legislation requires strong information security controlsB. incidents may have a high impact and frequencyC. Electronic commerce is a primary business driverD. incidents may have a high impact but low frequencyAnswer: BExplanation:ExplanationContinuous monitoring control initiatives are expensive, so they have to be used in areas where the risk is at its greatest level. These areas are the ones with high impact and high frequency of occurrence. Regulations and legislations that require tight IT security measures focus on requiring organizations to establish an IT security governance structure that manages IT security with a risk-based approach, so each organization decides which kinds of controls are implemented. Continuous monitoring is not necessarily a requirement. Measures such as contingency planning are commonly used when incidents rarely happen but have a high impact each time they happen. Continuous monitoring is unlikely to be necessary. Continuous control monitoring initiatives are not needed in all electronic commerce environments. There are some electronic commerce environments where the impact of incidents is not high enough to support the implementation of this kind of initiative.

NEW QUESTION: 3 Which two options accurately describe the network characteristics of a zone?
A. Commands such as snoop and dladm cannot be used on datalinks that are in use by a running zone.
B. By default, all IP addresses, netmasks, and routes are set by the global zone and cannot be altered in a non-global zone.
C. Shared IP is the default type of network configuration.
D. IPMP cannot be managed within the non-global zone.
E. Exclusive IP is the default type of network configuration.
F. DHCP address assignment cannot be configured in a shared IP zone.
Answer: C, F
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation: A: Non-global zones can not utilize DHCP (neither client nor server). B (not C): By default, non-global zones will be configured with a shared IP functionality. What this means is that IP layer configuration and state is shared between the zone you're creating and the global zone. This usually implies both zones being on the same IP subnet for each given NIC. Note: A zone is a virtual operating system abstraction that provides a protected environment in which applications run. The applications are protected from each other to provide software fault isolation. To ease the labor of managing multiple applications and their environments, they co-exist within one operating system instance, and are usually managed as one entity. The original operating environment, before any zones are created, is also called the "global zone" to distinguish it from non-global zones, The global zone is the operating system instance. Incorrect answer: E: Exclusive-IP zones can use IPMP. IPMP is configured the same way in an exclusive-IP zone as it is on a system not using zones. For shared-IP zones, IPMP can be configured in the global zone. F: Full IP-level functionality is available in an exclusive-IP zone. An exclusive-IP zone has its own IP-related state. An exclusive-IP zone is assigned its own set of data-links using the zonecfg command. The zone is given a data-link name such as xge0, e1000g1, or bge32001, using the physical property of the net resource. The address property of the net resource is not set. Note that the assigned data-link enables the snoop command to be used. The dladm command can be used with the show-linkprop subcommand to show the assignment of data- links to running exclusive-IP zones.
