NEW QUESTION: 1 A customer has these servers in their IT environment..1 Exchange server.6 SQL database servers.5 file servers.16 application serversThe customer is using an HP StoreOnce Backup System to back up their data. To achieve the best deduplication ratio/performance compromise, how many virtual libraries should be created?A. 0B. 1C. 2D. 3

Answer: BExplanation:

<http://www.manualslib.com/manual/484560/Hewlett-Packard-D2d.html?page=7>Key factors for performance considerations with deduplication:The inline nature of the deduplication process means that there will always be some performance trade-off for the benefits of increased disk space utilization.With each Virtual Library or NAS Share created there is an associated dedicated deduplication store. If Global deduplication across all backups is required, this will only happen if a single virtual library or NAS share is configured and all backups are sent to it.The best deduplication ratio will be achieved by configuring a minimum number of libraries/shares.Best performance will be gained by configuring a larger number of libraries/shares and optimising for individual deduplication store complexity.If servers with lots of similar data are to be backed up, a higher deduplication ratio can be achieved by backing them all up to the same library/share. If servers contain dissimilar data types, the best deduplication ratio/performance compromise will be achieved by grouping servers with similar data types together into their own dedicated libraries/shares. For example, a requirement to back up a set of exchange servers, SQL database servers, file servers and application servers would be best served by creating four virtual libraries or NAS shares; one for each server set. When restoring data from a deduplicating device it must reconstruct the original un-deduplicated data stream from all of the data chunks. This can result in lower performance than that of the backup.Full backup jobs will result in higher deduplication ratios and better restore performance (because only one piece of media is needed for a full restore). Incremental and differential backups will not deduplicate as well

NEW QUESTION: 3In order for us within our society to be able to make decisions about the kinds of punishments we impose upon those criminals who are convicted of crimes, we must first understand why we punish criminals.A. Beginning with understanding why we punish, we can then as a society make decisions about the kinds of punishments we impose upon criminals.B. Deciding upon the kinds of punishments we impose upon criminals, as a society, we must first understand why punishment is imposed upon criminals.C. In order for us within our society to be able to make decisions about the kinds of punishments we impose upon those criminals who are convicted of crimes, we must first understand why we punish criminals.D. To make decisions about the kinds of punishments we impose upon criminals, we must first understand why we punish criminals.E. In order for us to be able to decide about the kinds of punishments we impose upon people convicted of crimes, we must first understand why people should be punished.Answer: DExplanation:Explanation/Reference:Explanation:Choices a, c, and d are wordy and redundant, with a being the most problematic. Choice e changes to make decisions into deciding, creating an awkward sentence because the sentence opens with a participle rather than an infinitive clause, suggesting action already in progress rather than action that will be taken once reasons for punishment are understood.
