NEW QUESTION: 3 A network administrator is managing a hub-and-spoke network with EIGRP routing that has been enabled. The hub router is trying to query a remote router. However, delays are occurring that are caused by certain paths being stuck in active (SIA). How should the administrator configure EIGRP in order to limit the scope of the query range and prevent SIA from occurring? A. Configure the hub and remote router as stub routers. B. Disable the SIA feature of EIGRP on the remote router. C. Configure the remote router as a stub router. D. Configure the hub router with a scope limit of 1. E. Configure the remote router with a scope limit of 1. F. Configure the hub to indicate that the remote router is a stub router. Answer: C
Explanation: Configuring a router as a stub also helps the rest of the network. Queries are responded to much quicker and convergence happens much faster. Sometimes a query can cause delays that result in the path being SIA. If the stub configuration is applied, the router responds to queries as inaccessible, thus limiting the scope of the query range and preventing SIA from occurring.
