NEW QUESTION: 1A basic determinant of the elasticity of demand for a normal good is the:A. Number of complements available for the product.B. Number of substitutes available for the product.C. Number of sellers of the product.D. Length of time producers have to respond to market changes.Answer: B*Explanation:Choice "b" is correct. The change in demand for a product, based upon a given change in that product's price, is dependent on whether or not other (presumably cheaper) goods can be substituted for the product. Choice "a" is incorrect. The elasticity of supply (not demand) would take into account the response time producers might have to market changes. Choice "c" is incorrect. The number of sellers is irrelevant when calculating the elasticity of demand. Choice "d" is incorrect. A complement good's demand is the same as the primary good. For example, an increase in the demand for a given food would cause the demand for its complement to also increase. The increased demand of the complement is irrelevant when calculating the elasticity of demand.

NEW QUESTION: 2You have a cluster of FAS controllers with HDD aggregates. The data is being compressed into 32 KB blocks before being written to a volume. In this scenario, which type of compression is being used?A. adaptive, inline compressionB. secondary, inline compressionC. adaptive, postprocess compressionD. secondary, postprocess compressionAnswer: B*Explanation:NetApp data compression reduces the physical capacity required to store data on storage systems by compressing data within a flexible volume (FlexVol volume) on primary, secondary, and archive storage. It compresses regular files, virtual local disks, and LUNs. When NetApp data compression is configured for inline operation, data is compressed in memory before it is written to disk.
