NEW QUESTION: 2You configure an SRX Series chassis cluster with graceful restart support for the configured routing protocols. When testing your cluster failover in a large, multivendor lab environment, you notice that most of the BGP and OSPF neighbors remain adjacent, whereas a few other neighbors drop the adjacency with your cluster during the cluster failover test. You notice that the OSPF and BGP neighbors that drop the adjacencies are always the sameWhy is this happening?A. The local SRX cluster devices have misconfigured OSPF/BGP hello/dead interval timers, which cause the connections to flap during the failover.B. The OSPF/BGP neighbors in question are not running in GR helper mode, which causes the adjacencies to flap. C. The OSPF/BGP neighbors in question have misconfigured hello/dead interval timers, which causes the connection to flap during the failover.D. The local SRX cluster devices are not running in GR helper mode, which causes the adjacencies to flap.*Answer: B*Explanation:When a router is running graceful restart and the router stops sending and replying to protocol livens messages (hellos), the adjacencies assume a graceful restart and begin running a timer to monitor the restarting router. During this interval, helper routers do not process an adjacency change for the router that they assume is restarting, but continue active routing with the rest of the network. The helper routers assume that the router can continue stateful forwarding based on the last preserved routing state during the restart. If the router was actually restarting and is back up before the graceful timer period expires in all of the helper routers, the helper routers provide the router with the routing table, topology table, or label table (depending on the protocol), exit the graceful period, and return to normal network routing.Reference:
