The HTTP protocol is one of the most commonly used in today's networks. In addition, it requires the most amount of preprocessing time and has the most number of signatures requiring inspection making it critical to the system's overall performance. The Service HTTP engine uses a Regex library that can combine multiple patterns into a single pattern-matching table allowing a single search through the data. This engine searches traffic directed to web services only to web services, or HTTP requests. You cannot inspect return traffic with this engine. You can specify separate web ports of interest in each signature in this engine. HTTP deobfuscation is the process of decoding an HTTP message by normalizing encoded characters to ASCII equivalent characters. It is also known as ASCII normalization. Before an HTTP packet can be inspected, the data must be deobfuscated or normalized to the same representation that the target system sees when it processes the data. It is ideal to have a customized decoding technique for each host target type, which involves knowing what operating system and web server version is running on the target. The Service HTTP engine has default deobfuscation behavior for the Microsoft IIS web server.Reference: <http://www.cisco.com/c/en/us/td/docs/security/ips/51/configuration/guide/idm/idmguid/dmSgEng.html#wp1041186>
