You can also apply very specific control by using scripts called authorization rules. Authorization rules enable you to control the relationship between access control and the structure of your organization. Authorization Manager can help provide effective control of access to resources in many situations. Generally, two categories of roles often benefit from role-based administration: user authorization roles and computer configuration roles. User authorization roles are based on a user's job function. You can use authorization roles to authorize access, to delegate administrative privileges, or to manage interaction with computer-based resources. For example, you might define a Treasurer role that includes the right to authorize expenditures and audit account transactions. Computer configuration roles are based on a computer's function. You can use computer configuration roles to select features that you want to install, to enable services, and to select options. For example, computer configuration roles for servers might be defined for Web servers, domain controllers, file servers, and custom server configurations that are appropriate to your organization.
