NEW QUESTION: 1Your company's Google Cloud-deployed, streaming application supports multiple languages. The application development team has asked you how they should support splitting audio and video traffic to different backend Google Cloud storage buckets. They want to use URL maps and minimize operational overhead. They are currently using the following directory structure:`/fr/video/en/video/es/video/./video/fr/audio/en/audio/es/audio/./audio`Which solution should you recommend?A. Rearrange the directory structure, create DNS hostname entries for video and audio and leverage a path rule such as `/video/` and `/audio/`.B. Leave the directory structure as-is, create a URL map and leverage a path rule such as `/[a-z]{2}/video` and `/[a-z]{2}/audio`.C. Leave the directory structure as-is, create a URL map and leverage a path rule such as `/video` and `/audio`.D. Rearrange the directory structure, create a URL map and leverage a path rule such as `/video/` and `/audio/`.Answer: D
Explanation:https://cloud.google.com/load-balancing/docs/url-map#configuring_url_maps
Path matcher constraints Path matchers and path rules have the following constraints: A path rule can only include a wildcard character () after a forward slash character (/). For example, `/videos/` and `/videos/hd/` are valid for path rules, but `/videos` and `/videos/hd*` are not. Path rules do not use regular expression or substring matching. For example, path rules for either `/videos/hd` or `/videos/hd/` do not apply to a URL with the path `/video/hd-abcd`. However, a path rule for `/video/` does apply to that path.
