NEW QUESTION: 3What is the three way handshake sequence used to initiate TCP connections?A. SYN, SYN/ACK, ACKB. ACK, SYN/ACK, SYNC. SYN, SYN, ACK/ACKD. ACK, SYN/ACK, ACKAnswer: A
Explanation:The TCP three way handshake:1.First, the client sends a SYN segment. This is a request to the server to synchronize the sequence numbers. It specifies its initial sequence number (ISN), which is incremented by 1, and that is sent to the server. To initialize a connection, the client and server must synchronize each other's sequence numbers. 2.Second, the server sends an ACK and a SYN in order to acknowledge the request of the client for synchronization. At the same time, the server is also sending its request to the client for synchronization of its sequence numbers. There is one major difference in this transmission from the first one. The server transmits an acknowledgement number to the client. The acknowledgement is just proof to the client that the ACK is specific to the SYN the client initiated. The process of acknowledging the client's request allows the server to increment the client's sequence number by one and uses it as its acknowledgement number.3.Third, the client sends an ACK in order to acknowledge the request from the server for synchronization.

The client uses the same algorithm the server implemented in providing an acknowledgement number. The client's acknowledgment of the server's request for synchronization completes the process of establishing a reliable connection.
