NEW QUESTION: 1 Which two types of actions can trigger an event? (Each correct answer presents a complete solution. Choose two.) A. Some other program logic, such as a call to the program module. B. User intervention, such as a mouse click. C. Adding a delegate keyword. D. Declaring the signature of the delegate. Answer: B, D Explanation: * A delegate is a type that holds a reference to a method. A delegate is declared with a signature that shows the return type and parameters for the methods it references, and can hold references only to methods that match its signature. * Events in the .NET Framework are based on the delegate model. The delegate model follows the observer design pattern, which enables a subscriber to register with, and receive notifications from, a provider. An event sender pushes a notification that an event has happened, and an event receiver receives that notification and defines a response to it.
