NEW QUESTION: 3Which is a correct way to define a runtime exception as an EJB 3.x application exception?A. @ApplicationException public class MyAppException extends javax.lang.EJBExceptionB. public class MyAppException extends javax.lang.EJBExceptionC. @ApplicationException public class MyAppException extends javax.ejb.EJBExceptionD. public class MyAppException extends javax.ejb.EJBExceptionAnswer: C
Explanation: Use the @javax.ejb.ApplicationException annotation to specify that an exception class is an application exception thrown by a business method of the EJB. The EJB container reports the exception directly to the client in the event of the application error.
Note: java.lang.Object java.lang.Throwable
java.lang.Exception java.lang.RuntimeException javax.ejb.EJBException javax.ejbpublic class EJBExceptionextends java.lang.RuntimeExceptionThe EJBException is thrown to report that the invoked business method or callback method couldnot be completed because of an unexpected error (e.g. the instance failed to open a databaseconnection).
Example:The following ProcessingException.java file shows how to use the @ApplicationException annotation to specify that an exception class is an application exception thrown by one of the business methods of the EJB: package examples;import javax.ejb.ApplicationException;/ Application exception class thrown when there was a processing error* with a business method of the EJB. Annotated with the* @ApplicationException annotation.*/ @ApplicationException()public class

ProcessingException extends Exception {Reference: Programming WebLogic Enterprise
