NEW QUESTION: 3 In which LAN transmission method is a source packet copied and sent to specific multiple destinations but not ALL of the destinations on the network? A. Broadcast B. Multicast C. Overcast D. Unicast Answer: B Explanation: With multicast, a source packet is copied and sent to specific multiple destinations on the network. Multicast is a special protocol for use with IP. Multicast enables a single device to communicate with a specific set of hosts, not defined by any standard IP address and mask combination. This allows for communication that resembles a conference call. Anyone from anywhere can join the conference, and everyone at the conference hears what the speaker has to say. The speaker's message isn't broadcasted everywhere, but only to those in the conference call itself. A special set of addresses is used for multicast communication. The following are incorrect answers: Unicast sends a packet from a single source to a single destination. Unicast packets are sent from host to host. The communication is from a single host to another single host. There is one device transmitting a message destined for one receiver. In a broadcast, a packet is copied and then sent to all the stations on a network. Broadcast is when a single device is transmitting a message to all other devices in a given address range. This broadcast could reach all hosts on the subnet, all subnets, or all hosts on all subnets. Broadcast packets have the host (and/or subnet) portion of the address set to all ones. By design, most modern routers will block IP broadcast traffic and restrict it to the local subnet. Overcast is not a defined LAN transmission method. The following
