NEW QUESTION: 4 Review the storage pool information: Choose the correct procedure to repair this storage pool.A. Shut the system down, replace disk c3t3d0, and boot the system. When the system is booted, execute the `zpool replace pool1c3t3d0c3t3d0` command.B. Shut the system down, replace disk c3t3d0, and boot the system. When the system is booted execute the `zpoolonline pool1` command.C. Shut the system down, replace disk c3t3d0, and boot the system.

When the system is booted, execute the `zpool replacepool1c3t3d0` command. D. Shut the system down, replace disk `c3t3d0`, and boot the system. When the system is booted, execute the `zpoolclear pool1` command. Answer: C Explanation: You might need to replace a disk in the root pool for the following reasons: The root pool is too small and you want to replace it with a larger disk. The root pool disk is failing. In a non-redundant pool, if the disk is failing so that the system won't boot, you'll need to boot from an alternate media, such as a CD or the network, before you replace the root pool disk. In a mirrored root pool configuration, you might be able to attempt a disk replacement without having to boot from alternate media. You can replace a failed disk by using the `zpool replace` command. Some hardware requires that you offline and unconfigure a disk before attempting the `zpool replace` operation to replace a failed disk. For example: `# zpool offline rpool c1t0d0s0# cfgadm -c unconfigure c1::dsk/c1t0d0` <Physically remove failed disk `c1t0d0`> <Physically insert replacement disk `c1t0d0`> `# cfgadm -c configure c1::dsk/c1t0d0# zpool replace rpool c1t0d0s0# zpool online rpool c1t0d0s0# zpool status rpool` <Let disk resilver before installing the boot blocks> SPARC# `installboot -F zfs /usr/platform/`uname -i`/lib/fs/zfs/bootblk /dev/rdisk/c1t0d0s0 x86# installgrub /boot/grub/stage1 /boot/grub/stage2 /dev/rdisk/c1t9d0s0` Reference: Solaris ZFS Administration Guide, How to Replace a Disk in the ZFS Root Pool
